Dissertation

Title	The Body In Action .
Committee:	John Schwenkler (Chair), Jochen Bojanowski, John Hummel, Matthias Haase, Kristina Musholt.

In the spirit of the phenomenological tradition, philosophy of mind has explored how the human body shapes the mind under the title ‘philosophy of embodiment’. It is largely agreed upon that the human body is not only the realization base of our thoughts and perceptions; its particular shape and motion also determine the very form of how we think about and perceive the world. These insights have left no strong impact on the philosophy action. Here, the role of the body has been either ignored or misunderstood. This is strange given that it is the body that moves when we act – Its organs (our hands and feet) are our primary organs of agency. The purpose of my dissertation is to fill in this gap. First, I criticize various misconception of what the body in action is and what bodily movements (as the core elements of our actions) are. Then I explore how the shape and abilities of our body determine the very form of our practical reasoning and knowledge.
